Designated by the Colorado Legislature as the primary institution for graduate teacher education in the state of Colorado, the University of Northern Colorado has a 100-year history of preparing excellent teachers who have a positive influence on educational systems nationwide. If you are currently a K-12 teacher seeking to improve your skills in the classroom, check out UNC’s Master of Arts in Teaching with an emphasis in Curriculum Studies.

You will learn:

- How to design, evaluate and implement curriculum
- How to analyze contemporary practices and theories related to learning
- How to apply best practices for content-specific pedagogy
- How to conduct, analyze and utilize research in education

This fully online program is designed for working teachers and offers continuous enrollment, allowing students to begin the program during any semester. The coursework emphasizes three important abilities: critical reflection, systematic inquiry and collaboration.

The degree has a 30-credit requirement and can typically be completed in two years. In lieu of a thesis, students prepare and submit a manuscript for publication in a journal of their choice. One full year of full-time classroom teaching experience or equivalent is required to graduate from the program.

“After finishing my teacher license, I knew I would get my master’s degree at some point, but I wanted it to be relevant to my field. The Curriculum Studies: Master of Arts in Teaching program combined the philosophical foundations of curriculum with the current research of best practice in the classroom to provide a well-rounded and insightful view of the field I am diving into. Because of the flexibility of the evening and online courses, I was able to continue my career while teaching full time, allowing me to transfer new ideas to my classroom immediately.”

—Antonio Pinedo, North Valley Middle School, La Salle, Colo.
